Customer Reviews

There is no way that ALL of these reviews are legitimate. I can’t believe I wasted money on this book, I’m returning it right away. I have been a LONG time reader of the ‘Living Well, Spending Less’ blog, and there are blog posts that I read over and over (especially about minimalism with children, the No Spend Challenge posts, and more) and I share them with family and friends. I almost could not believe this book was from the same person. This is clearly more of an auto-biography than an informational book on saving money. I am FRUGAL, and try to save money anywhere I can with 5 children. I was so disappointed to read in almost every single chapter about how she had to break her habit of going on $500 Target shopping sprees, give up the expensive
Starbucks lattes, and that to this very day, she still overspends. Being frugal is making your own coffee from home, NOT going to Target (most expensive place ever, for everything) and saving money in every category. I also was disheartened by her constantly mentioning that she still to this day overspends. It's like reading a book about a recovering alcoholic, who beat his addiction, only to find out he MOSTLY beat the addiction, but still drinks from time to time. That is not inspiring at all. The bits and pieces about saving money were mediocre at best. I have been doing no-spend challenges for years, both through online Facebook groups, with Dave Ramsey fellow followers, and with girlfriends and my own husband. There was literally no helpful information about that at all.

LIVING WELL, SPENDING LESS is a well-written, practical guide on escaping from the constant "Must have more" lifestyle that is so prevalent today. The author, Ruth Soukup, comes across as a modest person—not so much lecturing you on what you should do, but instead, sharing lessons that she had to learn the hard way. The author clearly states that she is a Christian, and that this book is based on "what the Bible has taught me about the Good Life." The "secrets" in this book grew out of the author’s experience as a young girl. Ruth became enamored with building the perfect dream home; she would find photos of wonderful houses and dream of her life in these wonderful mansions. As an adult, she continued that habit, constantly buying more and more unnecessary things: "I'd spend hours drooling over magazines and catalogs, tearing out pictures of all the things I liked, all the things I knew I wouldn't be able to live without, all the things I knew would make me happy." Of course, Ruth finally realized the trap she had sprung on herself. She discovered that having fewer things actually translated into greater happiness: "The love of things can so easily consume us. The pursuit of it all—more toys, cuter clothes, a prettier house, a nicer car, a newer computer, a fancier phone—makes us forget all the things that actually matter. Not until I observed firsthand the real and immediate changes in my kids after getting rid of their toys did I truly begin to understand. My lesson to them was really their lesson to me: less stuff equals more joy." I think the greatest "secret" in this book is right at the beginning of the book—contentment, or the lack of it. We tend to not be content with what we have, in spite of massive material accumulations.
